

Your plan for your personal brand

People follow people they keep seeing. Your guide shows how clips put you in front of new people again and again, where to post first, and what counts as a view.

01

What clipping is, and why it works

Clipping is simple. You take the best moments from longer content (a song, a show, a stream, a launch video, an interview) and cut them into short videos. Then many people post those clips on their own accounts, across TikTok, Instagram Reels, YouTube Shorts and X.

It started with big creators paying people to repost their clips. Today labels, brands and TV shows use it to put their content in front of people who would never see it otherwise.

Why it works

People skip ads. They stop for clips. An ad looks like an ad, so thumbs move past it. A clip looks like something someone shared, so people watch it.

The feed does the finding. Short video apps show clips to people based on what they like to watch, not only on who they follow. A clip from an account with few followers can still reach strangers who love that kind of content.

Repetition builds memory. One post is easy to forget. The same song, face or product showing up again and again, from different accounts, in different feeds, is not. After enough times, people go looking for it.

You pay for results, not promises. You pay for views that pass review, not for a post going live and hoping it lands.

02

What clipping does for a personal brand

People follow people they keep seeing. Your own account only reaches the people who already follow you. Clipping puts you in front of everyone else.

Clippers take your best moments, from videos, talks, interviews or streams, and post them as short clips on their own accounts. New people see you again and again, in different places, until your name and face feel familiar.

That is how a personal brand grows: not from one viral post, but from being seen often by the right people.

What makes personal brand clips work

Strong opinions and clear lessons. Clips where you say something specific travel further than general advice.

Your face in the first second. People follow a person, so show the person straight away.

A clear way to find you. Make sure your name or handle is easy to find from every clip.

Your goal: more people knowing the name

Awareness comes from repetition: the same name, face or sound, seen many times in different places. Clipping is built for exactly that. Look at total counted views and how many different accounts posted, and watch for people searching your name.

03

How a campaign runs

You set the goal. We run the network. There are four steps.

1. Brief and strategy. You work with our team to set your niche, your content, the rate per 1,000 views and the budget. The brief says what clippers can post, what they cannot, and what every clip must include, such as your sound, your handle or a link.

2. Clippers activate. Your campaign goes live to the network. Clippers choose it based on fit and audience, so the people posting are the ones whose followers fit your content. The network is not a fixed roster. It is a network of clippers who pick the campaigns that suit them, which is why it can reach many niches at once.

3. Review before it counts. Every post is checked before it counts, and every approved post links to its source. Clips that break the brief do not count.

4. Pay for counted views. You pay only for views that pass review. Posts keep working after the budget is spent.

What we handle, and what you handle

We handle clipper outreach, briefing, review and payouts. You give us the content, agree the brief, and make sure the place people land on is ready. You follow everything on a live dashboard with a link to every approved post.

04

What to hand clippers

The campaign is only as good as the material clippers get. Before launch, put these together.

Source content. The full videos, the song, the episodes, the footage. More raw material means more different clips. Long content is fine; clippers find the moments.

The moments you love. Point to the parts you think are strongest. Clippers will find others, but your picks give them a head start.

The rules. What must be in every clip (your sound, your handle, a link, a hashtag), what must never be in one, and anything sensitive to avoid.

The goal. Views, streams, sales or awareness. Clippers edit differently for each, so tell them which one matters.

A landing place. Where people should go after the clip: a profile, a song, a store, a page. Check it works on a phone.

05

Where to post first

You picked TikTok. Each platform works a little differently, so here is the order we would start in, based on what you want the campaign to do.

Start with TikTok and put the whole first wave there.

01

TikTok

The feed shows clips to people who do not follow anyone yet, so a new song, product or moment can reach strangers on day one.

06

What counts and what does not

Not every view is paid for. Every post is checked before it counts.

What counts. Views on clips that follow your brief, are posted on a real account, and pass review. Every approved post links back to its source, so you can open it and see it for yourself.

What does not count. Clips that break the brief or the platform's rules, posts that are deleted, and anything that does not pass review.

Real views, not bots. Review is how fake views are kept out. Posts that look wrong do not count, and you can open any approved post and check it yourself.

You see it all on a live dashboard with a direct link to every approved post. You set the rules, the rate and the budget. Nothing counts until it passes review.

How pricing works

Clipping is priced on results, so it helps to know the words.

CPM means cost per 1,000 views. If a campaign pays $2.00 per 1,000 counted views, then 100,000 counted views cost $200.

Effective CPM is what you actually paid per 1,000 counted views once the campaign is done. It is the number to compare against other ways of buying attention.

The two parts of a campaign

The work. A fee covers what we run on our side: strategy, briefing clippers, review and reporting.

The clipping budget. This pays for the views themselves, at a rate per 1,000 views, with a cap on how much any one clip can earn. The cap keeps spend predictable and stops one clip from using the whole budget.

Two ways to clip

Mass clipping uses a large pool of clippers for volume: many accounts, many clips, fast. It suits releases, launches and big moments where being everywhere at once is the point.

A managed clipper team is smaller and closer to you. It suits campaigns where you want people to take an action, like buying or signing up.

Larger spend commitments unlock lower fees. We size the fee and the budget to your goal on the call.

What happens, and when

Before launch. The brief is agreed and the content is handed over. This is where most campaigns are won or lost.

The first 72 hours. Clips go live and views start moving. Early numbers show which moments and which hooks are working.

The weeks after. This is where much of the value sits. Clips do not expire. They keep getting found, so views keep adding up long after launch, and posts keep working after the budget is spent.

Reading the results. Most clients run a defined first campaign, long enough to read the numbers honestly, then decide whether to scale. Judge it on counted views, effective CPM and what happened to your own numbers (streams, sales, followers), not on the first day alone.

Proof from real campaigns

Campaigns that ran through the network, with the numbers from each.

Jake and Logan Paul, Paul American

11.2M_{total views}

$1.78_{effective CPM}

Paul American, the TV show from Jake and Logan Paul: clippers reposted clips from episodes 2 and 3 at $2.00 per 1,000 views, for 11.2M total views at an effective CPM of $1.78.

Kojo Blak

1.9M_{total views}

Kojo Blak's feature with Fantana and his song Excellent: clippers earned $2.00 per 1,000 views posting clips, for 1.9M total views. He later won Best New Ghanaian Artist.

Kojo Blak, artist

Kojo Blak talks about working with Maison d'Élites.

<https://youtu.be/j4dHabFOMJw>

Five mistakes that sink campaigns

Weak source content. Clippers cannot make a strong clip from a weak moment. Give them your best material, not what is left over.

Nowhere to land. Attention with nowhere to go is wasted. Have the song live, the store working or the profile ready before day one.

Rules nobody can follow. A brief with too many must haves makes clips stiff, and stiff clips do not travel. Keep the must haves short.

Judging too early. Day one is not the result. Clips keep picking up views for weeks.

One clip, one try. Campaigns work through volume and variety: many clips, many hooks, many accounts. Let the numbers show which ones win.

Your next step

Start with your own content. Pick the three strongest moments you have and ask: would a stranger stop scrolling for this? Those are the clips that travel.

When you are ready to talk numbers, reply to the email this guide came with and tell us a rough budget. We will tell you plainly what it can do.