

Your plan for a podcast or stream

Long shows are full of short moments. Your guide shows how clips turn those moments into reasons to watch the full thing, where to post first, and what counts as a view.

01

What clipping does for a podcast or stream

A long show is full of short moments: a story, a hot take, a laugh, a clash. Most people will never press play on a two hour episode. But they will watch thirty seconds of the best part.

Clippers find those moments and post them as short videos on their own accounts. Each clip is a small door into the full show. The people who walk through it are new listeners and viewers who came because a moment caught them, not because an ad did.

The more good moments are out there, the more doors there are.

You told us you want more views. That is the most direct thing clipping does: every clip is a new chance to be seen, and you pay for the views that pass review, not for posts or promises.

02

How a campaign runs

You set the goal. We run the network. There are four steps.

Brief and strategy. You work with our team to set your niche, your content, the rate per 1,000 views and the budget.

Clippers activate. Your campaign goes live to the network. Clippers choose it based on fit and audience, so the people posting are the ones whose followers fit your content.

Review before it counts. Every post is checked before it counts, and every approved post links to its source.

Pay for counted views. You pay only for views that pass review. Posts keep working after the budget is spent.

The network is not a fixed roster. It is a network of clippers who pick the campaigns that suit them, which is why it can reach many niches at once.

03

Where to post first

You picked TikTok and YouTube Shorts. Here is the order we would start in, based on what you want the campaign to do.

Start with TikTok. Add the others once the first clips are moving.

01 TikTok

The feed shows clips to people who do not follow anyone yet, so a new song, product or moment can reach strangers on day one.

02 YouTube Shorts

Shorts keep getting views for longer, and they point people to full videos, podcasts and streams on the same platform.

04

What counts and what does not

Not every view is paid for. Every post is checked before it counts.

What counts. Views on clips that follow your brief, are posted on a real account, and pass review. Every approved post links back to its source, so you can open it and see it for yourself.

What does not count. Clips that break the brief or the platform's rules, posts that are deleted, and anything that does not pass review.

You see it all on a live dashboard with a direct link to every approved post. You set the rules, the rate and the budget. Nothing counts until it passes review.

Bring three things: the content you want clipped, the dates that matter, and the budget you have in mind.
